Stories of the South is a very original and innovative book. Perhaps inevitably, then, it seems (to this reviewer at least) more suggestive than definitive; it is not necessarily possible to prove that the reconstruction of southern identity after the Civil War paved the way for or was even vital to the retreat from Reconstruction.

(a pretty smart story), and more besides. There is a significant contradiction at the centre of this book: although it is called A Century of South African Short Stories, Ms. Marquard claims in her introduction to have prepared "a comprehensive anthology of short stories from southern Africa." (My emphasis.) Is South equal or not equal to Southern?
